

APPENDIX A

SABRES IN KOREA

Although there were never more than six fighter interceptor squadrons flying the F-86 at any one time during the Korean War, there were a very large number of Sabres that were assigned to Korea either in the interceptor or fighter bomber roles over a span of 32 months. A small number of the Sabres were specially modified reconnaissance models that handled the photo-recce tasking in and around MiG Alley. This list of serial numbers is broken down by model, squadron assignment, miscellaneous data on aircraft names, nose art, assigned pilots where known, and any information available on postwar assignments. An (*) in the loss code column indicates that the aircraft record card could not be found.

The aircraft's official loss code is shown where known. There appears to have been some broad interpretation as to what these should be, considering the circumstances of some of the losses.

- A = Accident.
- M = Operational due to enemy action, but includes failure of oxygen systems and explosions.
- N = Operational on a combat mission, not enemy action.
- P = Cause unknown during a combat mission.
- Q = Enemy action not on a combat mission (bombed at Suwon AB).
